VISA UPHEAVAL

AS US TECH GIANTS EXPAND, INDIA SUPPLIES THE WORLD'S LARGEST ENGLISH-TRAINED TALENT POOL

Fee shock: India-US tech bridge crumbles

ALEX TRAVELLI
New Delhi, September 23

SOME OF THE biggest companies in the United States have been run by someone who grew up in India, immigrated with a specialized visa and proved their worth by rising to a top job in the Fortune 500.

Satya Nadella of Microsoft and Sundar Pichai of Alphabet, Google's parent company, moved to the United States on the H-1B visa programme, as did Indra Nooyi, who ran PepsiCo from 2006 to 2018.

On Friday, President Trump announced that every new H-1B application would come with a $100,000 price tag, a huge rise from the few thousands of dollars it cost before, sowing distress and confusion among workers and employers. The fee, which took effect on Sunday, has upended the system's long-term prospects, not least for workers in India, who have long accounted for a majority of H-1B holders. Any non-American who meets certain criteria is eligible for the visa — provided they bring "a body of highly specialized knowledge" needed by a US employer — but Indians are in a league of their own. They won 71% of H-1B visas in the 2024 lottery, and a similar proportion since the programme started in 1990. Applicants from China are a distant second, accounting for about 12% of the visas.

There were more than 300,000 Indians working in the United States on an H-1B visa as of 2024. They, along with their spouses and children, made up about a tenth of all Indian-origin people who reside in the country legally. Possibly millions of Indian Americans, including many living in India, owe their US citizenship to their own or their parents' use of the programme.

But there is no doubt that by making it 20 to 30 times more expensive for US companies to hire workers from India that Trump has scrambled a popular path between the two countries.

The move could dent India's economy by reducing how many H-1B holders send money home and, longer term, by weakening ties between Indian and American companies.

"These visas give Indians substantial exposure to the US, its professional culture and its soft power," said Alexander Slater, managing director at Capstone, a global forecasting and business strategy firm in Washington. "If the outcome of the policy change is that fewer Indians are working with Americans, it will weaken a significant bond between the two countries."

And for PM Narendra Modi, already dazed by Trump's trade war, it's another headache-inducing twist in the topsy-turvy relationship with the US.

At the signing of the order on the visa fee on Friday, Howard Lutnick, the US commerce secretary, said that the move would press US companies to hire more American workers. "That's the point of immigration: Hire Americans, and make sure the people coming in are the top, top people," he said.

The first wrinkle in the plan could be a mismatch between the world's supply and demand of tech workers. As American tech companies have grown into globe-spanning behemoths, India has been producing far more engineers and other scientific specialists, trained in English, than any other country.

"India has an engineering fetish because it had a Soviet fetish" during the Cold War, said Vinay Sitapati of Shiv Nadar University in Chennai. The newly independent country wanted a generation of engineers to build a modern nation from the ground up, said Sitapati, who is writing a book about Indian Americans with Dinsha Mistree of Stanford University. More recently, many of India's STEM graduates have ended up in the US and other highly developed economies.

The US issues 85,000 H-1B visas via a lottery each year. The visas are good for three years and renewable for up to six. The jobs that holders take tend to pay well, but studies show that most first-year visa winners earn less than the $100,000 that their employers will now have to fork over. Some 427,000 H-1B petitions were received in 2024.

A professional from India who has been working on Wall Street under a series of H-1Bs for more than a dozen years, but was not authorized to speak publicly, said that he started with a job that paid less than $80,000 a year, though he now earned much more. The higher cost will be borne by applicants and the companies seeking to hire them. TCS, was the second-biggest user of H-1B visa holders' labour this year, after Amazon. Along with Infosys, Wipro and other Indian IT services firms, TCS maintains a robust business sending employees with Indian passports to work on projects in America. The share prices of these companies fell on Monday over fears that they would not be able to retain those revenues.

India's tech giants have already reduced their reliance on H-1Bs, anticipating a rise in political resistance to migrant labor, the possibility of artificial intelligence doing more work and developed economies offshoring more professional jobs to workers in India, especially around the southern city of Bengaluru.

Other parts of South India that benefited from the era of relatively cheap H-1B visas could be hit harder. —NYT

UK eases skilled visa guidelines to woo investors

● Reeves says UK doesn't want to follow Trump on visa clampdown

AISHA S GANI
September 23

THE UK IS looking to take advantage of the chaos sown by US President Donald Trump's decision to overhaul his country's visa programme for certain college-educated foreign workers.

Britain will make it easier

RACHEL REEVES,
CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, UK

We are expanding our global talent and high potential individual visa routes, and we're moving quickly to make those easier to access for companies to bring in highly-skilled foreigners as part of the government's efforts to lure more investment into the country, according to chancellor of the exchequer Rachel Reeves.

"While President Trump announced late last week that it will make it harder to bring talent to the US, we want to make it easier to bring talent to the UK," Reeves said on Tuesday. "We are expanding our global talent and high potential individual visa routes, and we're moving quickly to make those easier to access."

Trump, who's spent much of his second term focused on immigration enforcement and ramping up deportations, has sought to overhaul the country's H-1B visa programme, which is primarily used by the tech industry due to a dearth of US professionals with science, math, and computer skills. As of Sept. 21, new applications for H-1B visas carry a $100,000 fee.

The UK has been considering ways it could revamp its visa system to lure in more highly skilled workers and investors that might pour significant sums into Britain, Bloomberg previously reported. In May, the government committed to "increasing the number of people arriving on our very high talent routes."

Reeves was speaking at an event in London's Canary Wharf neighborhood celebrating the opening of a new global headquarters for Revolut Ltd. As part of the festivities, the company agreed to invest more than $4 billion in its UK business by the end of the decade, a move that will create more than 1,000 jobs in its home market. —BLOOMBERG

New fees jolt Silicon Valley hiring, push firms offshore

ADITYA SONI & ECHO WANG
San Francisco/New York,
September 23

THE TRUMP ADMINISTRATION'S hefty new visa fees for H-1B workers have prompted high-level talks inside companies in Silicon Valley and beyond on the possibility of moving more jobs overseas — precisely the outcome the policy was meant to stop.

US President Donald Trump

on Friday announced the change to the visa program that has long been a recruitment pathway for tech firms and encouraged international students to pursue postgraduate courses in the United States.

While the $100,000 levy applies only to new applicants — not current holders as first announced — the confusion around its roll-out and steep cost are already leading companies to pause recruitment, bud-

Some firms pausing recruitment, budgeting and workforce plans and some looking to hire top talent in other countries getting and workforce plans, according to Reuters interviews of founders, venture capitalists and immigration lawyers who work with technology firms.

"I have had several conversations with corporate clients... where they have said this new fee is simply unworkable in the US, and it's time for us to start looking for other countries where we can have highly skilled talent," said Chris Thomas, an immigration attorney at Colorado-based law firm Holland & Hart. "And these are large companies, some of them household names, Fortune 100 type companies, that are saying, we just simply cannot continue."

About 141,000 new applications for H-1B were approved in 2024, according to Pew Research. Though Congress caps new visas at 65,000 a year, total approvals run higher because petitions from universities and some other categories are excluded from the cap. Computer-related jobs accounted for a majority of the new approvals, the Pew data showed.

The H-1B visa programme has also made it more challenging for college graduates trying to find IT jobs. The visa previously cost employers only a few thousand dollars. But the new $100,000 fee would flip the equation, making hiring talent in countries like India — where wages are lower and Big Tech now builds innovation hubs instead of back offices — more attractive, experts and executives told Reuters.
